BAYEUX CALVADOS AWARD

FOR WAR CORRESPONDENTS 2015

Editorial

15 years ago, we decided to make this event a true area for encounters and discussions between members of the public and professionals to whom we pay tribute. This approach now finds a constantly growing echo. At each edition, you have come in large numbers to attend the various get-togethers of this festival week dedicated to free information. This enforces our need to enrich our programming and adapt our welcome structures.

This year, the Bayeux-Calvados Award is pursuing its opening to the public, and extends the reception capacity of its evenings to 1,500 spectators.

One of the great successes of the prize is without doubt having been able to be seen as a reference with professionals who send us an increasing number of news reports in the competition, coming from at least 4 continents. Having the benefit from the testimony and insights of field journalists is an incomparable chance for each of us to get a better understanding of the news and issues of the conflicts that mark our world. This is what the Bayeux-Calvados Award of war correspondents is inviting you to. This year, among the 350 journalists in attendance, the members of the international jury will work under the presidency of Carlotta Gall whose pleasure it is to accept this fine responsibility.

Alongside, we wish to continue a true education for the media and raising awareness of international news in a wide section of the public, young people especially. Exhibitions in the entire city, encounters with journalists, prizes for school pupils, 15-year old youngsters, discussion evenings, book fair, documentary shows, action in the neighbourhoods, etc. These encounters are open to all, and contribute each year to achieving this undeniable goal.

The commitment of ever-loyal partners, particularly this year of the Basse-Normandie Region, enables us to continue this essential and dynamic openness.

We wish everyone a great week of information, discovery and discussion.

» Repercussions and battles surrounding the self-proclaimed Caliphate of the Islamic State.

In June 2014 the jihadist movement captured the Iraqi city of Mosul. Having taken advantage of the chaos reigning in Syria to seize control of the land, resources and population of the eastern part of the country, it continued to extend its zone of influence southwards, until in May of this year it entered the city of Ramadi, about 100km from Baghdad.

As a result of their savage repression of a Sunni opposition which they had already succeeded in radicalising, and in the absence of any attempt to stop them on the part of the international community, the Syrian and Iraqi governments managed to create ideal conditions for the expansion of Islamic State.

The photographs exhibited here show the victims, the displaced, and the settings for the horrific repression carried out by Islamic State jihadists, as well as the various groups fighting against them - Kurdish fighters from Iraq and Turkey, Shiite militiamen and soldiers of the Iraqi Army.

© Moises Saman / Magnum Photos

» “Discordia” documents photographer Moises Saman’s personal journey as a witness to the Arab Spring. This body of work takes the viewer on a four-year voyage through Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, Iraq, Lebanon and Syria as these states drift from revolutionary throes to violent fallouts. This project chronicles the indelible transformation of the region in this momentous period in Arab history.

Moises Saman is a documentary photographer and a member of Magnum Photos. His work has focused on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and more recently the turmoil of the Arab Spring. Working as a photographer for Newsday from 2000 to 2007, and regular contributor for The New York Times, Moises was one of the first photographers to reach northern Afghanistan after the 9/11 attacks in 2001. Moises Saman has received numerous international awards.

When the sky is blue

© Tomas Van Houtryve / VII

A wedding in Philadelphia (Pennsylvania) in December 2013. At about the same time, near Rada'a, in Yemen, a drone attack targeted a wedding procession, killing 17 people.

In October 2012, a drone strike in north-east Pakistan killed a 67-year old woman who was picking okra outside her house. A year later, her 13-year old grandson, Zubair Rehmann, confided to a conference in Washington DC: "I don't like it any more when the sky is blue. I prefer it when the sky is grey. Drones don't fly when the sky is grey".

Tomas van Houtryve decided to travel across the United States with his camera attached to a small drone. The idea was to photograph various situations in America which, in Pakistan or in Yemen, get targeted for American drone attacks - weddings, funerals, prayer meetings or sports training sessions. He also focused on places, such as the Mexican border, or certain prisons, where the United States government uses drones for monitoring purposes. These images, as seen from a drone, raise questions about the surveillance society, privacy and war.

» In a period when Iraq is waging a deadly war against Islamic State and is once again in danger of descending into sectarian conflict, a new generation of film directors is starting to emerge. After bearing the brunt of the American invasion and its disastrous aftermath - violence between religious groups, car bombs, kidnappings and the emergence of fanaticism - these young film-makers use the camera to communicate the volatile nature of everyday life in Iraq.

Katia Jarjoura, a Lebanese-Canadian film director who knows Iraq well, has set up an intensive short films workshop for young Iraqi film-makers in order to encourage and support the re-appearance of film-making in this region torn apart by conflict.

Contact Press Images

Somewhere in France Summer 1944 by John G. Morris

© John G. Morris / Contact Press Images

» A photographic record of day-to-day life in the summer of 1944, during the arduous liberation of France.

John G. Morris, picture editor for Life magazine in 1944, arrived in France seven weeks after D-Day, in the middle of the Battle of Normandy. He had come to give help and support to the correspondents of his weekly magazine - figures such as the legendary Robert Capa - in producing their reports. Armed with a Rolleiflex and about fifteen rolls of black and white film, he went around capturing things he observed here and there during the summer of 1944. These were not combat photographs, and they remained at the bottom of a drawer for decades since John G. Morris did not consider himself to be a professional photographer. Robert Pledge of Contact Press Images eventually persuaded him to publish these forgotten images together with the letters John had sent to his wife in the United States during this period spent in France.

PREVIEW SCREENING

"Eyes That Burn" ("Les Yeux brûlés")

A young woman goes to Roissy Airport to collect a military chest which is being returned to her. It contains the personal effects and photographs of Jean Péraud, a photojournalist who was killed at Diên Biên Phu on 8 May 1954. Before long, a discussion begins between the young woman and the former journalist colleagues of Péraud who are there too. Out of the memories and stories prompted by the young woman's presence, the ever-pertinent questions emerge: What constitutes an image of war? Is the photojournalist a witness or a participant? Is he protecting himself from the effects of war by filming it, or on the contrary, does he take even more risks in order to bear witness? Can we use the word 'art' about such images taken in the face of death?

With Mireille Perrier and the participation of Raoul Coutard, Marc Flament, Pierre Schoendoerffer and Raymond Depardon.

Directed by Laurent Roth. First released in 1986, the film has recently been digitally restored.

The Changing Images of War

» Times change and the nature of war too. Between the Vietnam war, covered by photographers who were incorporated into the American army with officer status, and the war in Syria, where photographers are considered to be prime targets, the status of war photographers has diminished dramatically. In the wake of the collapse of the print market, newspapers and magazines no longer commission photo reports from conflict zones, and we have to rely on the faith and audacity of a very small number of war photographers to provide us with precious accounts of events which have become almost invisible. To better understand these changes in the profession and the nature of war photography, you are invited to meet three photographers from different generations in a debate organized by Alain Fritel of the Paroles de Photographes (Photographers in Words) organization. We are delighted to welcome Patrick Chauvel, who has been covering international affairs for more than 40 years and whose reputation and talent shine out in every one of his stories; Alvaro Canovas, a photographer for Paris Match who has been covering international conflicts for more than 25 years, and Laurence Geai, a young photographer who has decided to pick up the baton from the older generation and has just spent several weeks in the occupied territories of the West Bank.

With her radio broadcast "Atem Al Zinzane" ("Darkness of Jail"), Ruwaida Youssef Kanaan keeps on looking for her former fellow inmate, Faten Fawwaz, who has been missing for more than a year.

» "Disparus" ("The Disappeared") is an investigation into the hidden side of a war still going on. Far from the bombs and the devastated cities, the film documents the use of an invisible weapon which has been wreaking havoc among the Syrian population since 2011: More than a hundred thousand people have disappeared, possibly even more - as many as those who have died in the armed conflict, according to some witnesses.

These disappearances show that the Syrian regime has set up a ruthless killing machine whose inner workings are torture, arbitrariness and cruelty. For the first time, families of those who have disappeared, survivors, and also torturers and executioners speak out about this journey into hell.

Through different protagonists, political leaders, religious figures and scenes filmed on the ground, this documentary throws light on the challenges and upheavals taking place in a country which seems condemned to perpetual instability.

★ Special Correspondents Evening

"Can the jihadist Daesh organisation create a true state?"

» In 2015 not a week has gone by without the words "Daesh", "Jihad", "Islamic State" or "Terrorism" dominating the headlines. These words, which in themselves represent the world of a single network, are now applied well beyond the borders of Syria and Iraq.

Today we are confronting attacks in Tunisia, Kuwait, Egyptian Sinai; splinter groups in Afghanistan and Libya; logistics bases in tourist idylls such as the Maldives; and fighters joining from around the world, including the West. A war of religion and territory? The establishment of terror? A war of communication? Control of energy resources? A geopolitical show of strength? This evening goes beyond the propaganda and the ready-made myths reflected by the media to try to gain a better grasp of Daesh, its origins and its development.

Does the organisation have the means necessary to achieve its ambitions, and could it really become an Islamic State? What would be the effects on the local populations? What local branches and offshoots does Daesh have around the world? Barack Obama has declared a war aiming to destroy the jihadist organisation, but does the international community have the means to destroy Daesh without sparking off other terrorist groups?

In the Name of the Temple

11.00 a.m.

Production: Zadig Productions, produced by Paul Rozenberg and Céline Nusse.

Directed by Charles Enderlin

› 'In the Name of the Temple' is the first documentary, drawing on exclusive interviews, to examine the emergence of messianic religious Zionism.

During the 6-Day War of June 1967, Israeli soldiers occupied the Temple Mount. This was the site of the Temple, the most holy place in Judaism, which had been destroyed by the Romans 2,000 years earlier. For nationalist rabbis, capture of the Mount confirmed their vision: Zionism is the herald of redemption. In order to seize possession of what they consider to be the Land of Israel, the Zionists sent their followers to colonise the Left Bank and Gaza. After spurning every single peace initiative, they are now preparing to build a new Jewish Temple on the site of the Al Aqsa holy mosques, the third most holy site of Islam.

The screening will be followed by a discussion with Charles Enderlin

The fight for Yemen

2.00 p.m.

A BBC production. Directed by Safa Al Ahmad. Broadcast by Special Investigation Canal +

› In September 2014, after 4 days of fighting, Houthi rebels took control of Sanaa, the capital of Yemen. A few days later, Safa Al Ahmad, a BBC journalist, managed to enter Yemen. She is the only journalist to have filmed for a western television station, a considerable feat in a country cut off from the world for several months. The film is an outstanding document, the result of a highly risky journey which begins in Saada, the province of the Houthis in the north of the country. It was from here that the Houthis began their conquest of Yemen, a country divided into tribal zones, some of which are loyal to the arch-enemies of the Houthis - Al Qaeda.

This is Exile - Diaries of Child Refugees

3.00 p.m.

A film by Mani Y. Benchelah

» An extraordinary intimate portrait of child refugees forced to flee from the violence of Syria's civil war to neighbouring Lebanon. Filmed over a year by the Emmy-award winning director Mani, the documentary tells the stories of the children's lives in their own words and captures the moving truth of how they deal with loss, hardship and the poignancy of dashed hopes. Their testimony in this film is a beautifully crafted microcosm of the human cost of the ongoing civil war in Syria that has forced over 4 million people to flee; half of whom are children. There is still no end to the war in sight. The documentary is highly topical but it is also a timeless creation that engages with the essence of what it is to be exiled from your home and the normality of life. With its truly poetic visual style there is space for the mind to wander through the film's locations and to understand the profoundly disturbing truth that these children are unlikely to see their homeland again until adulthood.

Mani is a French-Algerian freelance director, filmmaker and photojournalist who worked on documentary and long news features in Niger, Pakistan, India, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq.

Reporter's Memorial

Unveiling of the Stele for 2014 and the beginning of 2015

The stele at the Memorial to Reporters for 2014 and the beginning of 2015 will be officially unveiled in the presence of Christophe Deloire, General Secretary of Reporters Without Borders, and family members and friends of journalists killed in the course of the last year.

Although the number of journalists killed in the course of their work - 71 journalists and 20 netizens - fell slightly, the year 2014 saw the development of a different form of violence, involving ever greater exploitation of atrocities committed against journalists. A journalist is no longer a collateral victim or an awkward witness: he has become an incarnation of freedom who must be eliminated, a challenge in a battle of ideologies. The killings have thus become more and more barbaric, gruesomely staged in order to gain attention and create sinister propaganda.

The ceremony this year will pay a special tribute to the 12 victims of the attack against the editorial team of Charlie Hebdo. This black day in the history of the world's press demonstrates the extreme violence which can be meted out to those who dare to criticise - or even simply question - religion. Among the victims were five cartoonists and illustrators who were extremely popular in France, including Cabu, Wolinski and Chab.

The stele will also pay tribute to fifteen Syrian journalists, victims of the civil war which has now been raging for four years. Syria today is the most dangerous country in the world for journalists. They are systematically targeted by Bashar al-Assad's security forces, by pro-government militias and by jihadist groups including Islamic State. Since March 2011 40 journalists have been killed while carrying out their work in Syria, 13 of them foreigners.

"We continue to mobilise every single day, in the face of murders, kidnappings, imprisonment and censorship, to help both journalists and citizens to achieve their mission of conveying the truth" says Christophe Deloire. "Resolution 2222, supported by Reporters Without Borders and adopted by the United Nations Security Council last May, demonstrates the determination of the international community to secure better protection for journalists in conflict zones. Fighting against impunity, which is too often the case when journalists are assassinated, has to be our top priority", continued the General Secretary of the organisation.
